

Ecopsychology explores causal connections between the existential conditions “nature estrangement” and “nature alienation” and diverse situations where psychological wellness is compromised in various degrees of severity--a new name for an old affliction. Some of the illnesses or mal-adaptations that ensue from “nature estrangement” and “nature alienation” may be, at present and in the past, misdiagnosed, and while using modern medical terminology, treated from an “urgency” intervention model-bias that is insensitive to life-long “natural prevention.” These practices are biased toward resolving most matters of illness in pharmaceutical, costly-technological and trauma-like fashion. The old affliction is our new hysteria, multi-determined, multi-defined, and multi sub-classified as decontextualized illnesses that owe their etiology to a widespread degradation of bodies, intellects, spirits, and planet. Ecopsychology assumes that in the absence of or by neglecting and ignoring long-established ancient (biological or cultural) adaptations or traditional practices that were once, and still are, conducive to a simpler and more manageable life in the presence of RAW NATURE or sustainable cultivated nature, and in the midst of aberrant and extreme changes to these “body-spirit” good adaptations and traditional practices, the human psyche is assaulted, overwhelmed, and made ill by artificial and unjustified complexity.
