

Damned if you do, damned if you don't. Mike could have been a priest, but instead of serving sinners from behind a screen, he's hearing them from behind a bar. Now some devil has unleashed Hell on Earth, and there's no stopping it. But devils can be a matter of perspective, and this is one confession that has Mike wondering about his career choice. Where would you want to be at the end of days? "Last Call" is a very short, fantasy flash fiction - so short, in fact, that it probably won't show you much in the preview, so here's a bit of it: I should've called the place Father Mike's. The believers are trying to get right with God, here at the end. Could've been a priest, but I didn't like the secrecy of Confession; sinners are more honest when they're drinking. The rioting started right after the W.H.O. announcement, when those morons told everyone to remain calm, that the plague was most likely contained, but "here's a list of seventy-three newly quarantined cities." Who did they think they were fooling? You could see the blood pooling under the announcer's eyes before he was done. Whoever made this one knew his stuff; there'll be no stopping it without him. It showed up in Boston yesterday; won't be long before it's here and we all drown in our own blood. "Hey Mike," Tommy says
