Not illustrated. 1920 Excerpt: ...he may manage, before he can hope to rear better queens than the bees possess when let alone he must make a study of the fundamentals of bee behavior with special reference to the building of queen cells, the acceptance of foreign queen cells, or virgins, or laying queens, the supersedure of queens, the swarming instinct, and such kindred phenomena. It is through lack of knowledge of this sort that so many succeed in rearing only inferior queens, fail to rear any at all, or tho successful in getting a few respectable cells built, lose them in introducing them into their colonies. Still others who purchase valuable Italian queens from the University or from southern breeders, violate the habits and instincts of the bees in their attempts to introduce them and thus lose the major portion. The first fundamental fact to be retained in mind is that bees are wild, untamable, uneducable creatures. Because through long ages of evolution they have developed organs and body parts specialized for functioning in certain definite ways, for giving fixed responses to given conditions of their environment, it is almost impossible for a beekeeper to modify their behavior to any appreciable degree. It is hardly safe to say that they are mere organic machines which respond to any given situation in any unalterably fixed manner. No doubt they may learn a very few habits of behavior which they do not possess when they see the light of day, but these habits arc so limited in scope and so controlled by their fixed instincts as to be negligible. Their ability to make special adaptation of their behavior to special conditions of environment is almost nil. They do not plan actions; they do not adopt new ways of doing work; they do not learn by experience. Therefore, the apiarist in ...
