Excerpt from Report of the International Meteorological Congress: At Paris, France, September 19-26, 1889 This report by Lieutenant Ward of the proceedings of the International Meteorologic Congress at Paris, in September, 1889, will, it is thought, be of general interest, although its publication has been unavoidably delayed. This office was honored by the committee on organization with a request to send a delegate, and upon the Hydrographers recommendation the Honorable Secretary of the Navy delegated Lieutenant Ward, then naval attache at the United States legation, Paris, to represent the office. Although it has been impracticable to publish in full the copious appendices accompanying the report itself, yet this abstract of the daily proceedings must be of value, and it well illustrates the intelligence, thoroughness, and care with which the Congress discussed the various important subjects that were brought before it. This office is heartily in favor of more effective cooperation between the various offices that are working in marine meteorologic research, and it is interesting to note the strong support given by this congress to this matter. Attention has also been called to the fact that an international system of simultaneous observation might well be arranged in order to chart and discuss data for the southern hemisphere, as has been done already for the northern, and this is a subject in which navigators are especially interested. It must, I think, be acknowledged that the general results of such international congresses are very good, and it is gratifying to know that this office was represented, and represented so well, upon this occasion.
