

Tiredness may be described as the special bane of the late twentieth century. Probably never before have the people of Western civilisation been collectively so tired. The invention of various appliances, intended to take the drudgery out of housework, has resulted in the housewife having to take up an outside job, in order to buy them and pay for their maintenance. Modern life is full of hitherto unheard of tensions - planes to be caught, deadlines to be met, children to be taken to and picked up from pre-school on time - the list is endless. All these factors contribute to chronic tiredness. Tiredness can rob us of our appetite for food, the pleasure of good companionship, joy in marriage, home and children, even of healthful sleep. It can diminish our work satisfaction. Nationwide, it can lead to loss of manpower in the work force, as well as accidents at home, in the workplace, or on the road. Among the many causes of tiredness, we can list, first, the physical. Many people are chronically tired because of structural misalignments (spine, shoulders, pelvis, neck out of place) of which they are unaware. These may date back to birth or be the result of later accidents. The treatment of such disabilities comes into the realm of the osteopath, chiropractor, or physiotherapist. Other causes of tiredness may be gathered under the heading of chemical. Here belong such things as food and other allergies, glandular malfunctions, immunological breakdown, dietary excesses and deficiencies. Many people believe their diets to be adequate and moderate, when in fact they are not. All these maladjustments can be successfully treated by the nutritionist, naturopath, homoeopath or acupuncturist. The third group of factors responsible for tiredness may be broadly classified as mental. This does not mean that they are imaginary. They are only too real. They include emotional states that may affect digestion, general behaviour, sexual potency, sleep patterns. Nowadays, stress clinics are set up to help people suffering from these disorders. Treatments include training in relaxation, hypnotherapy, meditation, development of positive attitudes and the cultivation of better habits of thought: the psychologist, the minister of religion (whatever creed), and the group therapist, all have a part to play here. Of course, all three categories listed above may overlap and interlace. For instance, a long standing emotional state may be rectified by a simple neck adjustment. In this book, Leonie McMahon gives us the benefit of her encyclopaedic knowledge and clinical experience of fifty years. There is so much you can do to help yourself regain and maintain your energy, given expert guidance as well as actual treatment.
